Bio of The Great Pedro The "El Negro": The Unsung Navigator of the Age of Discovery

"1468-1502 – PEDRO ALONSO NIÑO:

Pedro Alonso Niño was born in 1468 in Moguer (Huelva), and died in 1502 on the island of Hispaniola. He was a Spanish navigator and explorer who actively participated in the discovery of America.

Pedro Alonso Niño or Peralonso Niño was the second son of Alfón Pérez Niño, and was known as "El negro" (The Black One) due to his involvement in the African slave trade.

He was married twice, the first time to Juana Muñiz, from whom three children were born: Juan Niño, Isabel Quintero and Leonor Fernández, and the second time to Leonor de Boria, with whom he had Francisco Niño.

He actively collaborated, along with his brothers, in the organization and preparations for Christopher Columbus' first voyage, where he served as chief pilot of the flagship Santa María, where he played a fundamental role in supporting Columbus's desire to continue with the voyage when, after a few days, the crew rebelled because they had not yet found land. After the Santa María caravel ran aground on December 25, 1492, La Niña became the flagship, making the return trip to Castile on the ship La Niña, with Christopher Columbus as admiral and Pedro Alonso Niño as chief pilot. He repeated the role of chief pilot of the flagship on Columbus' second voyage in 1493, from which they returned shortly after, since on March 7, 1494 they were already in Cádiz. For this trip Pedro Alonso received seventeen thousand maravedis.

In October 1494 he set sail again from Seville for the Indies, and in April 1495 he was back in Seville. In mid-June 1496 he set sail again as chief pilot on the ship Santa María de Guía, owned by García Álvarez de Moguer, along with the caravels Lázaro and Catalina. After a short stay in the Indies, they returned to Cádiz on December 2, 1496, a journey he made as captain and chief pilot of the fleet.

On a later trip to Paria, Pedro Alonso discovered Margarita Island and Punta de Araya in the Lesser Antilles with their important salt mines, which facilitated navigation and the carrying out of operations in those lands by being able to have that important food preservative (Salt) on site.

In 1499 he teamed up with Cristóbal Guerra, the biscuit maker of Triana, and together they planned a private expedition to the recently discovered lands on the Pearl Coast (Paria). To carry out this enterprise, his brother Cristóbal Niño was named captain of the expedition, leaving Pedro Alonso Niño as the main pilot of the caravel with 33 men.

We find him again in the role of the expedition of Nicolás de Ovando in 1502 as a backup pilot, and not as a main pilot, since Pedro Alonso Niño was added by express order of the Crown as extraordinary pilot of the flagship Santa María del Antigua, in addition to the normal pilot Diego Ortiz. The fleet, which was made up of 32 ships, set sail on February 3, 1502. When they were returning to Castile at the beginning of July 1502, a hurricane off the coast of Hispaniola destroyed the fleet, leaving no trace of it. It was a great disaster, since the commander Francisco de Bobadilla, Antonio de Torres, Pedro Alonso Niño and all the other members of the fleet perished in it.

Contribution to Columbus's Expeditions

When Christopher Columbus embarked on his historic voyage in 1492, he relied heavily on experienced navigators. Pedro Alonso Niño's expertise ensured the fleet's survival through storms, unpredictable currents, and unfamiliar coasts. Niño's exceptional skills were evident when he successfully commanded the Santa María, Columbus's flagship, and helped in the discovery of the Bahamas.

Independent Expeditions and Economic Ventures

After the initial voyages with Columbus, Niño's ambitions led him to undertake his own expedition in 1499, financed independently. Along with a crew, he sailed to the coasts of South America, trading with indigenous populations for pearls and other resources. Niño's voyage was among the earliest European ventures that directly sought to profit from the newly discovered lands, showcasing his pioneering spirit in establishing trade routes. However, his success attracted scrutiny, leading to legal battles with the Spanish Crown over alleged undeclared profits.

The Racial Dynamics of Niño's Legacy

Pedro Alonso Niño's African heritage is a testament to the diverse backgrounds of the explorers who shaped early globalization. However, historical records have often minimized his identity, focusing instead on the grand narrative of European conquest. The erasure of Niño's contributions reflects broader patterns of racial exclusion in the documentation of history. Recent efforts by scholars to uncover and celebrate Niño's role have brought attention to how Black explorers were integral to the Age of Discovery, yet remain marginalized in historical texts.
